

Fall Prevention Programs Across the Multidisciplinary Team

October 9, 2024 • 1:30–2:45 p.m. CT

www.LeadingAgeIowa.org/FallPrevention

Falls in long-term care settings are both a persistent problem and a significant expense. Understanding the intrinsic and extrinsic causes of falls and effective prevention methods is crucial for senior living professionals. This session will provide participants with an in-depth overview of falls in senior living environments, exploring the various and diverse risk factors and situations that contribute to them—many of which are preventable.

Attendees will learn how age, disease, and environmental hazards influence fall risks and discover that the likelihood of falls increases significantly with the number of risk factors present. The presentation will equip learners with strategies for multidisciplinary teams to collaboratively assess, select, and implement fall prevention programs tailored to their communities. Additionally, the session will cover principles of effective documentation for nursing, supporting the delivery of fall prevention services, and methods to evaluate the success of these programs.

- Identify interdisciplinary approaches to assess fall risk.
- Recognize the principles of effective documentation for nursing to support fall prevention services.
- Implement fall prevention programs that are tailored for the organization.
- Evaluate the effectiveness of a fall prevention program.
